MULTILEVEL CONSTITUTIONALISM
AND THE CRISIS OF DEMOCRACY
IN EUROPE

Ingolf Pernice, Berlin*

* Professor Dr. jur., Dr. h.c. Chair for public, international and European law, Humboldt-Universität zu Berlin, Direktor of the Walter Hallstein Institute for European Constitutional Law (WHI) of the Humboldt-Universität zu Berlin (www.whi.eu) and co-Director of the Alexander von Humboldt Institute for Internet and Society (www.hiig.de). This contribution arises from a lecture given at the Aristoteles University of Saloniki the 4th of December 2014, and was accepted for publication in the European Constitutional Law Review 2015, issue 3. The author is grateful to his assistants Mattias Wendel and Laura Wolfstädter for their valuable contribution to finalising this paper.
MULTILEVEL CONSTITUTIONALISM AND THE CRISIS OF DEMOCRACY IN EUROPE

by

Ingolf Pernice, Berlin *

Abstract

A misconception of the EU is the reason for increasing scepticism – multilevel constitutionalism: conceptualising the EU as a matter of the citizens – critiques and the defence of multilevel constitutionalism - European treaties as a form of a new supranational social contract – embedded autonomy in a system of divided sovereignty – explaining and enhancing democratic legitimacy of the EU – the legitimising principles of additionality, of voluntariness and of open democracy – taking ownership of the EU and taking subsidiarity seriously – backing the European monetary policy by new competences for a common economic and fiscal policies – engaging in European politics as a way out of the crisis.
INTRODUCTION

The European Union is in crisis. It is a financial crisis, it is a crisis of democracy, and it is a crisis of mind. Some people in some Member States believe that the financial crisis is over. This is not the case in Greece, if I am not mistaken. People are suffering, the austerity policies imposed in exchange to new loans are breath-taking. If some finance ministers and the bankers speak of an end of the crisis, people might see this less optimistically. What is not over at all is the crisis of democracy and of mind.

Here is how I see it: People do not trust their governments. And even less so they seem to trust the European institutions, particularly those in charge of the financial crisis. As the European elections of May 2014 indicate, there is a strong move towards scepticism against the EU, if not an increasing trend to reject the idea of European integration in general. David Cameron talked already in his Bloomberg Speech of January 2013 about a withdrawal of the UK from the Union if the EU does not return to a mere free trade area. That he employs this idea in the hope to win the British elections in 2015 tells us a lot about minds in Britain. As to France, the self-declared anti-European extreme right party of Marie le Pen has won 32% of the French seats in the European Parliament. In Germany too, we have a new anti-Euro-party gaining ground, and in Greece – the cradle of Europe and democracy – the sympathy for the European Union is under particular stress.

What has all this to do with ‘multilevel constitutionalism’? I submit that multilevel constitutionalism is a valid theoretical concept for explaining the EU, and that understanding the EU as an example of multilevel constitutionalism can support the citizens taking ownership of their EU and, thus, serve as a remedy to the crisis of democracy and minds in Europe. To demonstrate this, let me, first, give you some reasons for why I believe that some current misconceptions of the EU and its constitutional architecture might be the source of an increasing distrust to the very idea of European integration and to the Union at large. I will, second, explain my citizen-based position by summarizing the concept of multilevel constitutionalism and strive to defend it against certain reservations and criticisms with a view to, finally, develop some ideas on how the EU could overcome the crisis of democracy by taking seriously the citizens of the Union.

I. MISCONCEPTIONS OF THE EU AND ITS CONSTITUTIONAL ARCHITECTURE

People have difficulties to understand what the EU really is, and what it is made for. It is an abstract entity, we cannot see nor feel it. We do not even have a proper language to describe it. So we use terms of traditional political philosophy and constitutional law, developed for states. The EU is not a state. Misunderstandings necessarily result from this. Though we have some idea about what is meant by democracy, the rule of law, separation of powers, fundamental rights or federalism, these concepts too do not necessarily fit for the EU. The fact that their understanding varies from country to country, a common translation for the EU is far from likely.
If most observers agree that the EU is not a (federal) state, there is less agreement on what it is. Is it an international organisation or a federation of sovereign states? The terminology developed by Georg Jellinek, in particular the categorical distinction between the federation of states (with no legal personality) and the federal state (having legal personality) is difficult to apply to the EU. The EU is in-between, with features or elements of both. Some talk about an organisation sui generis, but even this open qualification does not give us a hint of what the EU really is. Paul Kirchhof, and with him, the German Federal Constitutional Court created the term ‘Staatenverbund’, some sort of compound of states. This is where we stand until today.

What is the problem with this term – a term which has received broad acceptance at least of governments, constitutional courts and the ‘conservative’ state-centred legal academia? It describes the EU as a creature of states, not of people. It uses the form of its establishment – international treaties – as determining its legal nature, including the claim that the Member States remain sovereign states, and the ‘masters of the Treaties’. So, the EU is a matter of the states, of abstract political bodies having established an even more abstract organisation for their purposes. The owners of the EU, in this view, are states, not people, not the citizens.

Governments and even national constitutional courts may like to main this approach, for it preserves power. It is more convenient for them to govern without the people being involved. If the states are recognised as the masters of the treaties, people accept more easily to focus and limit their interest to national policies. Some constitutional courts interpret Union law as international law, for its applicability at the national level then depends on national law and is subject to their scrutiny. This allows the courts to feel powerful, if not sovereign, and to have the last word in each case of doubt.

Brussels is often accused by political leaders, in national parliaments and in the public discourse to be a threat to national political autonomy. It is seen as a separate, foreign power intruding in spheres of national autonomy and interfering with the democratic prerogatives of national parliaments. The principle of subsidiarity and what we call the ‘early warning system’, thus, were introduced as a defence against the EU grabbing competences and power. Some members of national parliaments use constitutional courts for the same purpose: To fight against the beast and so gain popular support. And some courts happily admit such cases – though Article 263 TFEU clearly gives the European Court of Justice the power to judge upon excès de pouvoir – because it adds to their power.

If the Member States are the ‘masters of the Treaties’ and European policies are part of the external policies, why should people feel responsible as citizens of the Union and participate in the political processes? People notice that European policies shape their conditions of work and life, like national policies, but they are not involved. They are frustrated for not having a voice, feel to be governed by ‘thirds’, contrary to the ideas of self-government. So they condemn the Union for having a democratic deficit. Frustration regarding inefficiencies of European economic and foreign policies – areas where the EU has no or only limited competence – adds to their negative attitude.

---

All this, I submit, is the result of false explanations and wrong concepts of what the EU really is about. Multilevel constitutionalism offers a different perspective.

II. THE CONCEPT OF MULTILEVEL CONSTITUTIONALISM

Take the perspective of a citizen of a democratic Member State. Conceptualize the European Union as a creature not of states but of the citizens acting through, and represented by, their national governments in the name and on behalf of the citizens. This is how I understand democratic states. Treaties, negotiatied by governments implementing the will of the people, are ratified with the authorization of national parliaments representing the people, if not directly after a referendum. Specific ‘integration-clauses’ in our national constitutions allow that, contrary to normal international agreements, the EU Treaties confer powers on the institutions created and organised by these treaties. They open up the nation-state to a common, supra-national legislative, executive and judicial authority acting with direct effect upon the rights and duties of the individual. And as people are directly affected, a need was felt to exist for the protection of fundamental rights similar and equivalent to what we are used to have against the national public authority. This is why we have, since the Treaty of Lisbon, the Charter of Fundamental Rights which is legally binding and part of the Unions primary – or as I would say, constitutional – law.

As I have elaborated more deeply in other pieces of my work, thus, my proposition is to view and explain the EU from the ’bottom up’ perspective of the citizen. By concluding the EU Treaties the way I said, citizens ’constitute’ this European Union and so define themselves as the ‘citizens of the Union’, and they give themselves a common new political and legal status in addition to their political status of citizens of their respective Member States. The citizens are the ‘masters of the Treaties’, as much as in their status as national citizens they are the masters of their national constitutions. In the process of the making and developing the EU Treaties, national governments and other institutions are tools or instruments in a constitution-making process: they make the constitution of a supranational Union that is based upon, and complementary to, the national constitutions.

The term ‘multilevel’ constitutionalism seems to imply a hierarchy. But the supranational as an additional constitutional level is not hierarchically higher or lower than the national constitution, but juxtaposed in a pluralist sense. European constitutional law is not separate from, but based upon, the national constitutions; European and national constitutional law are in many ways interwoven and interdependent, they form one system of law, a unity in substance producing, idealiter, one legal solution in each particular case.
This systemic unity is reflected in three sets of principles governing the constitutional architecture of the EU, unknown in international law contexts, but common to federal systems:

a. With regard to the distribution of powers, the principle of conferral (Article 5 (2) TEU and Article 7 TFEU) guided by the principle of subsidiarity in a broad sense ensures a limited and balanced attribution of competences to the EU (see the system established by Articles 2 to 6 TFEU), while the exercise of the powers conferred to the EU is governed by the principles of subsidiarity in a more specific sense and under the control of the national parliaments, and of proportionality (Article 5 TEU).

b. With regard to the relationship between Union law and national law, the former precedes the latter in cases of conflict. National administrations by implementing European legislation (Articles 4 (3) TEU and 291 (1) TFEU) and national judges by ensuring effective legal protection in the fields covered by Union law (Article 19 (1) subpara. 2 TEU) act as European agents bound by the principle of primacy in all cases as required by the principles of uniform application of Union law, effectiveness and equality before the law.

c. To further ensure the functioning of the system, there are specific constitutional safeguards: the provision on common values and general principles of law (Article 2 TEU), the principle of permeability between the two constitutional levels and, in particular, specific provision for the effective protection of fundamental rights at both levels, where Union law is applied (Article 6 (1) TEU and Article 51 Charter of Fundamental Rights).

All these provisions make sense if understood as a way people organise public authority at national and supranational level, instituted with different powers, for acting in their common interest, respectively, for different purposes as their common ‘agents and trustees’. Consequently, the European Union can be understood – in legal terms – as a composed constitutional system founded in the will of the citizens in their capacity and status of both, citizens of their respective Member States and citizens of the Union. These citizens are the owners of the Union – in legal and political terms – and apart from the citizens, there is no source of legitimacy for the policies implemented by the respective institutions at each level. The recognition of a direct effect of provisions of the Treaties as well as of EU directives in the case law of the European Court of Justice since the judgment Van Gend & Loos and the development of the rights derived from the Treaties from individual rights of market citizenship to civic rights of Union citizenship since the Trea-

---

5 See for the underlying idea J. Madison, ‘The Influence of the State and Federal Governments Compared’, in A. Hamilto, 16 The Federalist Papers (1787/88): ‘The federal and state governments are in fact but different agents and trustees of the people, instituted with different powers, and designated for different purposes.’
7 ECJ 5 February 1963, Case C-26/62, NV Algemene Transport- en Expeditie Onderneming van Gend & Loos v Netherlands Inland Revenue Administration.
ty of Maastricht, allow the citizens play also a fundamental role in safeguarding the European law as ‘guardians of the Treaties’.8

Recognition of the ultimately political democratic status and responsibility of the citizens of the Union9 can be found in the provisions on the double representation of the citizens, directly in the European Parliament and indirectly in the European Council and the Council, whose members are accountable, as Article 10 (2) TEU specifies, ‘either to their national parliaments, or to their citizens’. Recognition can also be found in Article 11 TEU on the participation of citizens and civil society in the EU political process and, in particular, on the citizen’s initiative. Finally, it is more than symbolic that Article 14 TEU on the European Parliament specifies that it is ‘composed by representatives of the Union’s citizens’, and not as in earlier times, by representatives of the peoples of the Member States.10

III. CONCEPTUAL RESERVATIONS AND CRITIQUES

The concept of multilevel constitutionalism as a guide for better understanding the European Union has found some acceptance in literature, but it did not remain without criticism either.11 In German scholarship, it was primarily Mattias Jestaedt who qualifies the term ‘Verfassungsverbund’ [constitutional compound] as being an oxymoron.12 Following basically his argument, in the English-speaking literature, René Barents has undertaken to explain why ‘the multilevel theory is a fallacy’.13 Both cannot understand how there could be a unity of two separate legal orders each claiming autonomy. Jestaedt takes a Kelsenian theoretical position and sees no way to reconcile the thesis of unity of the two legal orders if there is not a common ‘Grundnorm’ [basic norm] in the Kelsenian sense.14 In the same line of thought, Barents takes a pluralist view for the two autonomous legal orders that he sees ‘competing’ with each other, but denies the possibility of unity.15 While I have already dealt with the arguments of Jestaedt at another place and shall resist repeating my reply to him,16 for paving the way to developing further my citizen-based perspective of constitutionalism beyond the state and, in particular in the EU, let me

---

11 For an oversight on the reception of the concept ibid., p. 352-353.
14 Jestaedt, supra n. 12, p. 111-127.
15 Barents, supra n. 13, p. 178-179.
shortly discuss the four key points of critique developed by René Barents:17

Unity in substance, the concept of a European social contract, the autonomy thesis and the concept of divided sovereignty.

1. ‘UNITY IN SUBSTANCE’ IN THE CITIZEN’S PERSPECTIVE

I have proposed multilevel constitutionalism as a normative theory for better understanding the EU as a new mode of political self-organisation of the people in Europe empowering themselves to meet in common, through supranational institutions, challenges that the individual states on their own are unable to deal with effectively. This means that the process of European political integration can be reconstructed as a constitutional process from the early fifties, involving both the national and the European constitutional level. EU primary law thus is understood as set of constitutional law, complementary to each of the national constitutions, built upon them and modifying in part their reach, substance and meaning.18

Barents suggests that after the failure of the Treaty establishing a Constitution for Europe in 2006, what he calls the ‘deconstitutionalisation’ in the framework of the Lisbon Treaty should have resulted in a ‘modification of the multilevel theory’.19 But this shows a misunderstanding both of the theoretical concept and of the constitutional leap made by the Treaty of Lisbon. Multilevel constitutionalism was developed in the late nineties long before the Constitutional Treaty or the Treaty of Lisbon were in sight.20 The work of the Constitutional Convention laying down a Draft Treaty on the Constitution of Europe, was an attempt to give the constitutional nature of the primary law of the EU a more explicit and systematic expression. It was rejected for a number of reasons. In substance, however, the Lisbon Treaty that came into effect, finally, instead, not only gives better ground for a constitutional reading of the EU primary law, but also confirms the pluralist concept of autonomous but interdependent legal orders forming together one composed constitutional system in the service of the citizens.21

Barents, basing his critique on a rather formal reading, considers the ‘unity in substance thesis’ an absurdity as it suggests that the 28 national constitutions and the Union constitutional order are understood to form this unity.22

18 For the case of Greece see L. Papadopoulou, ‘Die implizite Änderung der griechischen Verfassung durch das EU-Recht’, 74 Zeitschrift für ausländisches öffentliches Recht und Völkerrecht (2014) p. 141 in particular at p. 143–144. For Germany see the decision of the German Constitutional Court BVerfG, 19.7.2011, 1 BvR 1916/09, <www.bverfg.de/entscheidungen/r20110719_1bvr191609.html>; visited 9 July 2015, giving Article 19 (3) Basic Law a reading that allows contra legem, in order to comply with EU law of non-discrimination, legal persons of other Member States to be treated as national legal persons with a view to the protection of fundamental rights.

19 Barents, supra n. 13, p. 158.

22 Barents, supra n. 13, p. 160.
Yet, from the perspective of the individual citizen only one relevant national constitution and the European law, applicable side by side in each Member State are of relevance. Unity does not mean identity, for the European legal order is necessarily distinct from, while complementary to, each of the diverse national constitutions. So, unity does not exclude diversity in source, contents and design of the two components of the system, nor does it exclude national constitutional identity as granted under Article 4 (2) TEU. The opposite is true. From a sociological perspective, identity may grow and become more defined when distinguishing itself from other identities under a common concept. The European context might even promote a process of formation of national identities, also in a legal sense. In the EU, however, national constitutional identities have a “European dimension”. It would be a misapprehension grounded in post-colonial nation-building processes by European elites to suppose that ethical diversity, and thus a broad spectrum of differing basic constitutional decisions, constitutes an obstacle for unity. The phrase ‘United in diversity’, when it was selected as the motto for the European Union, has not only represented a feeling of Europeans, but it was popular also in heterogeneous countries such as South Africa and Indonesia.

Thus, there is neither a need nor the will in the EU to form a unity of twenty-eight identical national constitutions. With a view to ensure vertical and horizontal coherence, nevertheless, Articles 2 and 7 TEU are a safeguard for a certain degree of homogeneity of all the components of the European constitution as required for the proper functioning of the system. Together with corresponding provisions in national constitutions, such as Article 23 (1) of the German Basic Law, these basic requirements represent some sort of ‘system of mutual stabilisation’. In addition, the judicial dialogue, both vertically and horizontally, connects the courts into a European judicial network.

Unity in substance does not necessarily imply a monist approach in the traditional sense; it rather means that two separate but permeable autonomous 23 This also covers the point made by Barents, supra n. 13, p. 162, that not all Member States take part in all domains, e.g. not in the EMU. The proposition made at this place, that by virtue of Protocol no. 30 the Charter of Fundamental Rights is exempted from the jurisdiction of the ECJ and national courts in the UK and Poland is questionable (see: I. Pernice, ‘The Treaty of Lisbon and Fundamental Rights’, in S. Griller and J. Ziller (eds.), The Lisbon Treaty. EU Constitutionalism without a Constitutional Treaty? (Springer 2008) p. 235, at p. 244-249) and in any event not relevant here for the same reasons.

24 See insofar the critique of Barents, supra n. 13, p. 161, with reference made to my piece, ‘Multilevel Constitutionalism and the Treaty of Amsterdam: European Constitution-Making Revisited’, 36 Common Market Law Review (1999), p. 703 at p. 712; if I wrote ‘the result seems to be a monist approach’ this was not meant, as shown by the explanations given, to take over all implications the traditional distinction of monism and dualism would bring about.

26 See J. Knorr, 62 Aus Politik und Zeitgeschichte, (11-12/2012), p. 16 at p. 17.

29 So suggested by Barents, supra n. 13, p. 159. Barents misinterprets (ibid., note 40) that the pluralist approach is ‘explicitly denied’ in I. Pernice, Das Verhältnis europäischer Gerichte zu nationalen Gerichten im Europäischen Verfassungsverband, (De Gruyter 2006) p. 54. The text clearly accepts a pluralist approach in a formal sense, while in substance a number of provisions in the Treaties set limits and ensure homogeneity, coherence and interaction. For a more elaborated analysis see F.C. Mayer and M. Wendel, ‘Multilevel Constitutionalism and Constitutional Pluralism. Querelle Allemande or Que legal orders are interconnected by rules that exclude situations in which two conflicting legal answers are found applicable to a single legal problem. The system, thus, produces one legal solution for the citizen, in each case, and this is what the rule of law requires. The EU constitution, thus, can be conceptualized as one integrated system, composed of national and European constitutional components established by, and applicable to the citizens of the Union.

2. THE CONCEPT OF A SOCIAL CONTRACT

Accordingly, multilevel constitutionalism conceptualizes the composed European constitution as a system based upon the will of the citizens. It assumes a double political identity, national and European, of each citizen. Democratic legitimacy is understood as being rooted in the will of the peoples of the Member States having agreed to share Union a common citizenship related to the Union as an additional political community established by the European Treaties. The concept of a European social contract is used to underline the contractual quality of the broadly consensus-based legitimacy of the supranational public authority so established.30

Barents criticises this concept as being a fiction and a ‘matter of democratic ideology’; he understands the negative referendums in France and in the Netherlands as demonstrating the opposite: ‘The will of the citizens is not to have a common European will’, he says.31 Whatever might have been the reasons for people in these two countries to vote against the Constitutional Treaty, the conclusion drawn from the result is questionable. Since the ratification of the EEC Treaty, national parliaments representing their respective peoples and, in some cases, the citizens directly by referendum have voted in favour of the Treaties, their successive amendments or the accession of their country to the Union. If we assume that the Member States are democratic, it is far from ‘wishful thinking’, to assume that at least a majority of the citizens of the European Union support this common project.32 The Treaties do not create a European super-state but, instead, establish a supranational public authority that is complementary to that of the Member States. This is the answer to Barents’ question ‘why the organisation of public power at the Union level is substantially different from that at the national level’.33

Barents refers to the ‘old wisdom’ or question, whether one ‘can serve two masters’.34 Yet, both, the EU and the Member States, are democratically organised polities, they are not ‘masters’, in no way, but they are both democratically legitimated and controlled instruments of the citizens for pursuing their common public interests. People in Europe are mature citizens, not subjects of the crown or of any other body exercising uncontrolled power. Once

---

31 Barents, supra n. 13, p. 166-169. See also ibid., p. 174.
32 Interestingly, Barents, supra n. 13, p. 173, accepts that ‘all Treaties concluded by democratic states represent the will of the citizens’.
33 This question put by Barents, supra n. 13, p. 168.
34 Barents, supra n. 13, p. 169.
we accept that not the states but ultimately the citizens are the ‘masters of the treaties’, the democratic idea of ‘self-rule’ also applies to the Union.

Also Christoph Möllers criticises that Rousseau is misinterpreted where the concept of ‘social contract’ is used with regard to the EU. He stresses that the historical situation is quite different and that the EU Treaties have not been concluded by the citizens but by states; representation through the states, he stresses, is not possible for a contract if it is to be a social contract.35 True, the historical background is different, and a social contract establishing new legitimate public authority is a matter of individuals, not of public bodies. But this is exactly my proposition: the citizens, not states are the relevant actors. Governments and parliaments are only the instruments through which the process for coming to an agreement is organised. Citizens have chosen – as laid down in the integration clauses of the respective national constitutions – to use the office of their governments to negotiate, and of their parliaments to control and ratify the treaties, if the ratification is not authorised directly by referendum. The constitutional framework of the EU, thus, is not established by a third party,36 it is not an octroi by forces foreign to the citizens but relies on some kind of general agreement and broad consensus among the citizens concerned.37 If it is not a contract signed by 500 million people, the population of the EU – this has never happened for a constitution, it can nevertheless be attributed to them, ‘as if...’ they had agreed to it. There is no other subject of legitimacy in political systems than the citizens; the state has no legitimacy in its own, it is an abstract entity and somewhat instrumental for its citizens. Granted, the text of Article 1 TEU seems to point to a more state-oriented approach;38 what is more important, however, is to see who each government or parliament, in the absence of a referendum, is acting for and whom their action is attributable to: The citizens of each Member State acting through their representatives with the aim to establish common institutions, common powers and decision-making and, accordingly, a common legal and political status: citizenship of the Union.

If the reference, made by the first Article of the Constitutional Treaty, to the will of the citizens, was left out in the Lisbon Treaty, the reason was to avoid the impression that there was a European people at the origin of a European state. The European Council of 20 July 2007 had agreed in his mandate for the Intergovernmental Conference negotiating the Treaty of Lisbon that ‘the constitutional concept, which consisted in repealing all existing Treaties and replacing them by a single text called “Constitution”, is abandoned’.39 This does not mean, however, that the constitutional concept as was developed in doctrine and accepted by the Court of Justice was questioned in general. It was only the specific concept, as described in the given phrase. All symbolism typical for constitutions of a state, consequently, was renounced to. The In-36 This is what Dieter Grimm suggests, with a view to distinguish the European Treaties, concluded by states, from national constitutions made by the people (see for this: D. Grimm, ‘Does Europe need a Constitution?’, 1 ELJ, (1995) p. 282 at p. 290). In my view, this distinction cannot be made in substance for the people are what the state represents.

---

37 See also Pernice et al., supra n. 30, p. 68 et seq.

38 For this argument see Barents, supra n. 13, p. 173-174.

teregovernmental Conference returned to the form of a treaty amending the EU Treaties, thus, contrary to a formal constitution, a reference to the will of the citizens was rightly held inappropriate insofar. Yet, this does not mean to deny that the EU Treaties are ultimately rooted in the will of the peoples of the Member States.

3. AUTONOMY AND PRIMACY IN THE EU CONSTITUTIONAL SYSTEM

Barents understands multilevel constitutionalism as a monist approach, if there is unity in substance based upon the principle of primacy. To assume the autonomy of both legal orders composing the system, in contrast, and to talk about pluralism, would be in contradiction to the unity thesis.\(^\text{40}\) I have already explained that the concept of multilevel constitutionalism is not monist in the traditional sense. As we talk about the architecture of a new kind of composed system, concepts and terminologies of the past centuries may not be helpful.

There is neither pure unity nor pure autonomy. As conflicts between a European rule and a national rule can occur, an accommodation for the conflict is needed. Barents understands that the ‘multilevel theory’ anchors the priority of the Union level in the common will of the citizens, calling this a ‘democratic fiction’.\(^\text{41}\) This is not meant, however. As the EU legal system cannot hermetically be isolated from the national legal orders and vice versa, so that conflicts do arise in particular cases, the EU rule must be given precedence in cases of conflict as a matter of the principle of equality before the law (Article 9 TEU, Art. 20 Charter of Fundamental Rights). It is rather a question of the rule of law and of systemic logic than a question of democracy and political choice. In some way also effectiveness, the ‘effet utile’, plays a role. Clearly, the authors of the Treaties envisaged a Union that is functioning effectively. Contrary to a federal state, however, primacy in EU law does not mean that a superior federal rule invalidates the inferior rule of the states. It only means that in case of conflict the national rule is inapplicable.\(^\text{42}\)

Giving effect to Union law includes the respect of the principle of primacy and, as part of it, the duty to interpret national law consistent with EU law. Barents sees with the concept of primacy of application [Anwendungsvorrang] as opposed to primacy of validity [Geltungsvorrang].\(^\text{43}\) The duty of interpretation of national law consistent with EU law, however, is rooted rather in the principles of sincere cooperation and loyalty of the national bodies (Article 4 (3) TEU), than in primacy. Within the limits of interpretation of national law it requires that national law is constructed so as to give effect to the relevant European rule and to avoid conflicts with European law. Autonomy, thus, does not exclude normative interdependence, mutual respect and influence but only intrusion: European institutions may not invalidate national law, and national bodies may not invalidate European law. Both legal orders have their own sources of law and their own and separate

\(^{40}\) Barents, supra n. 13, p. 175-176.

\(^{41}\) Ibid., p. 177.

\(^{42}\) See most clearly ECJ 22 October 1998, Case C-10/97, Ministero delle Finanze v IN.CO.GE. '90 Srl et al., para. 21.

\(^{43}\) Barents, supra n. 13, p. 178.
provisions for judicial review and invalidation. What the rule of primacy makes sure, however, is that - in spite of the multilevel structure of the system, as explained - there is one legal answer only for each legal problem.

4. Divided Sovereignty Revisited

Sovereignty seems to be an important argument in the discourse on European constitutionalism, and the use of this term for the defence of the autonomy of the national legal order is widespread. The German Constitutional Court has used it abundantly in its judgement on the Treaty of Lisbon, though the Basic Law does not mention it. If the concept is used at all in describing the EU, however, in terms of multilevel constitutionalism, sovereignty – or its exercise – is understood to be divided or shared among the national and the European level. The idea is not new, indeed, as divided sovereignty is a concept of American origin, as Barents rightly reminds us. And it was used also in the German debate of the theory of federalism in the early 20th century, namely by Georg Waitz and Robert von Mohl. Barents posits that ‘this concept relates to the ultimate source of power in a polity’, talking about dividing it would make it ‘obsolete or at least inappropriate for theoretical purposes’.

Whatever the problem with dividing sovereignty might be, in practice sovereignty does not seem to be absolute. So the 1874 Constitution of Switzerland guarantees in Article 3 the sovereignty of the cantons ‘insofar as their sovereignty is not limited by the Federal Constitution’. The text of the Swiss Constitution of 1999 was slightly modified into: ‘The Cantons are sovereign except to the extent that their sovereignty is limited by the Federal Constitution’; this is interpreted as a case of divided sovereignty. As Dieter Grimm shows, sovereignty was not always undividable; only the work of Jean Bodin gave the term this meaning. Barents quotes Calhoun saying: ‘To divide it is to destroy it’. Perhaps this is what should be done, at least in constitutional law and theory.

Sovereignty has no specific legal meaning, if it is assimilated with the political self-determination of people in a delimited territory. This seems to be the line

---

44 See more in detail Pernice, supra n. 29, p. 54.
45 The Court has recently affirmed the principle of autonomy in ECJ 18 December 2014, in Opinion 2/13 – ECHR, though it seems to be necessary to understand the principle as „embedded autonomy“ so to take account of the responsibility of the national constitutional courts to cooperate in ensuring the respect of the rule of law and the limits of EU powers, see I. Pernice, Autonomy of the European Legal Order – Fifty Years after Van Gend & Loos, in: Antonio Tizzano, Juliane Kott and Sacha Prechal (eds.), 50ème Anniversaire de l’arrêt 50th anniversary of the judgment in Van Gend en Loos, 1963-2013, Actes du Colloque Luxembourg, 13 mai 2013 – conference proceedings Luxembourg, 13 May 2013 (2014) p. 55.
52 Barents, supra n. 13, p. 179.
53 See also Schiemann, supra n. 46.
followed by the German Constitutional Court in its judgment on the Treaty of Lisbon.\textsuperscript{54} Yet, given the increasing interconnectedness of economies, borderless communication and information, asymmetries of security threats and globalization, democratic self-determination cannot be achieved by states individually. Sovereignty, and similarly people’s sovereignty is a concept for past centuries. The ‘external’ effects of national policies\textsuperscript{55} require revisiting old concepts and developing new approaches.\textsuperscript{56} With the interdependence of states in a globalised system, external sovereignty becomes questionable. The EU is a laboratory for exploring new ways to ensure democratic self-determination by common institutions for common problems. If Barents quotes Carl Schmitt with its definition: ‘Sovereign is he who decides on the exception’,\textsuperscript{57} the most one can learn from this famous saying is that sovereignty has nothing to do with law. What remains is the conclusion that instead of using the term sovereignty in European law it may be preferable to more modestly talk about sovereign rights and explain the sharing of powers between the states and the Union as a tool of the citizens to achieve their objectives effectively at the appropriate level according to the principle of subsidiarity.

IV. ENHANCING DEMOCRATIC LEGITIMACY IN EUROPE

To assess and enhance democratic legitimacy of the EU and its policies, it is not sufficient to compare the Union’s institutional structure and legislative processes with those of a Member State, including electoral systems and provisions on transparency and accountability, opportunities of participation and active involvement of citizens and civil society. As already said, the Union is not a state and so constitutional concepts for states are not necessarily applicable to the European Union. In the light of multilevel constitutionalism the EU differs from a state, though it exercises public authority and, therefore, needs legitimisation by those who are subject to this authority. It is an instrument, complementary to the states and build upon them, for the citizens to meet challenges beyond the reach of sovereign state policies. Striving for democracy in the EU following simply a state model would be adapting it to a state. The better option seems to be to respect and even enhance the specificities of the Union and organise democratic legitimacy at its level in an adapted and efficient way.

Three structural principles of the European Union have to be taken into account, and four commands need to be heeded for enhancing the democratic legitimacy of European policies.

\textsuperscript{54} BVerfGE 123, 267, \textit{Lissabon}, para. 224; on this see also Mayer and Wendel, supra n. 29, p. 144.
\textsuperscript{57} Barents, supra n. 13, p. 181.
1. STRUCTURAL PRINCIPLES OF THE UNION

Three principles characterize the European Union\(^{58}\):

- Regarding powers, it is the principle of additionality.
- Regarding participation, it is the principle of voluntariness.
- Regarding legitimacy, it is the principle of open democracy.

\(a\). Additionality

Additionality means that decisions are taken at the EU-level only on such measures that cannot at all, or at least cannot effectively, be taken by individual Member States. Both, the attribution of competences and their exercise at the EU level are governed by the principle of subsidiarity. If taken seriously, subsidiarity is the key to democracy in a multi-levelled setting, since it excludes that action is taken at EU level if the goals can be reached by national measures. Member States are functioning democracies and the degree of relative political influence of the individual – and the degree of self-determination at this level – is necessarily higher than at EU level with a population of 500 million. In turn, in matters where the states cannot act effectively, nothing of their powers is lost, no opportunity of democratic self-determination is given away when such power to act is conferred to the EU institutions. On the contrary, people can let have challenges be dealt with and problems be solved, which in earlier times they could not have – at least neither peacefully nor without interfering with the sovereignty of other states. This is, of course, at the cost of accepting the procedures agreed within the European Treaties, including the majority rule. Yet, it was a voluntary choice of all Member States, made in the name of their citizens, and we should assume that this constitutional agreement was for a good purpose and to the benefit of all. From the perspective of the individual, thus, the EU is a gain in efficient self-determination.

\(b\). Voluntariness

Voluntariness means that the EU offers opportunities for the peoples of its Member States. After accession to the Union there is the force of law and the obligations resulting from the Treaties. But there is no power, whatsoever, for physical coercion to participate. Article 50 TEU even allows withdrawal from the EU. Member States continue to hold the monopoly of physical coercion. According to Article 4 (3) TEU their job is to give full effect to EU law, if necessary by physical action, if EU law so requires. A Member State may refuse to implement its obligations, but this is to the expense of continued benefits from a functioning EU in a longer perspective. What really counts is that the EU has no police nor army to enforce decisions. It is trust in the observance of the law, including the rule of law – not of man or force – and the equality of all before the law that carries the Union: voluntary participation and respect of the law as determined in an open and democratic process.

---

c. Open democracy

Open democracy is what our policies for overcoming the crisis of democracy and mind in Europe have to focus on. What do I mean and what needs to be done with a view to enhancing democratic legitimacy and accountability in the EU?

2. Four Commands for Enhanced Democratic Legitimacy

There are, basically, four commands to consider. First, we – the Union citizens – must take ownership of the EU. Second, we have to take subsidiarity seriously. Third, large parts of the economic and fiscal policies of the Member States need to become European policies. And fourth, we the citizens of the Union have to use all opportunities to engage.

a. Taking Ownership of the EU

Ownership means to resist the idea that the Member States are the masters of the Treaties. The latter tends to decouple EU policies from the citizens. Taking ownership means that the citizens are the owners of the EU, that the EU is one of our instruments for shaping our future. Taking ownership means realizing that there is no ‘other’, ultimately responsible for what the EU is meant to do and what it finally does and achieves, no other than us, the citizens. Is the Union a union of states, or is it a union of citizens? This makes a substantial difference. Democracy in the EU can only exist if citizens accept the EU as their vehicle for specific purposes. Understanding it as a union of states, we risk to lose out of sight that it affects us, directly; it would be ‘others’, states to shape our future, and the only way of giving some limited and very indirect legitimacy to its policies would be to democratically organise the formation of the will of the states that determine the policies of the Union.

Given the provisions in the Treaties on double legitimacy (Article 10 TEU) it seems save to accept that the EU is a Union of states and citizens. But the provisions in the Treaties on the political rights of the citizens (Articles 10 (3) and 11 TEU and 20 TFEU) and their representation in the European Parliament (Article 14 (2) TFEU), show that citizens play a role not only in their states but also in the EU. These civil rights give citizens a political status related to the EU, they become members of an emerging European public sphere, as a structural element of a common identity of European citizens. Thus, they can take ownership of the Union by realizing that they are responsible both ways. First, in exercising their democratic rights internally with regard to the EU-policies of their respective government – this European dimension of national elections is fundamental if national parliaments are considered to be a source of legitimacy for the policies at the Union level, but it is still rarely understood to be of relevance in the reality of political practice. Second, citizens take ownership and are responsible for European politics directly in European elections and other forms of participation offered by the 59 In this sense see also Habermas, supra n. 6, p. 35-37. See also Pernice, supra n. Fehler! Textmarke nicht definiert., p. 194.

---

60 See on European Union citizenship as a precondition for European publicity: Calliess and Hartmann, supra n. 8, p. 132-145, 151; for the provisions and internet-related new conditions of ‘open democracy’, enhancing citizens ownership and participation in the EU see also Pernice, supra n. Fehler! Textmarke nicht definiert., p. 192-195.
Treaties. Thus, democracy on the EU level can be understood as an exercise of participative power not only by ‘the people’ of each Member State as a collective, but also by every single citizen acting both ways, as a national and as a Union citizen.61

b. Taking Subsidiarity Seriously

Decisions on what the EU should be responsible for and how it shall carry out its duties are political decisions. Consequently, they are part of the political processes at both levels. Ultimately, they are a matter for each citizen – both, as a national and a Union citizen – to stand for. Becoming aware of this political responsibility of each citizen and of the democratic decision to confer powers to, and later to exercise them at, the European level only under the conditions of subsidiarity, would avoid unnecessary abstract debates on the tasks and the justification of the EU. It would also help democracy to function better, given that the democratic legitimacy of European politics largely depends on this awareness and the understanding that functioning democratic processes of which citizens are part – both within the national political systems and of the European system are the foundation for the proper functioning of the EU.

c. Giving the EU Responsibilities for Economic and Fiscal Policies

Democracy is a matter of the citizens, not of established governments. So, it is difficult to believe that our governments by their own initiative would strive for more democratic control, be it at the national level or the Union. The solutions found, provisionally, for managing the financial crisis – the Six-Pack, the Two-Pack including the European Semester,62 the Fiscal Treaty, the debt brake and the European Stability Mechanism – give the governments more control. They enhance what is called executive federalism in Europe.63 In matters of highest impact for the conditions of the citizens’ daily life – economic, budget and re-distributional policies – we see the national parliaments under new constraints and regulatory control, exercised by the European Commission and the ministers of finance in the Council. In emergency situations, this may be justified; in a medium and long term perspective, however, it is contrary to the democratic principles referred to in Article 2 TEU, and it is inappropriate as a remedy to the structural deficits of the Economic and Monetary Union.

In short: a common currency needs to be backed by the convergence of the participating economies. Granting the Member States autonomy in their economic and fiscal policies is in contradiction to their general duty to ensure convergence through the coordination mechanism of Articles 119 to 121

61 See also Calliess and Hartmann supra n. 8, p. 85. This is the very basis of my concept of ‘Verfassungsverbund’ (see Pernice 1995, supra n. 27, p. 261-262, more in detail: Pernice 2001, supra n. 27, p. 166-167) or ‘multilevel constitutionalism’ (see supra, III.).

63 For the term ‘Exekutivföderalismus’ as a characteristic of the EU all together see: P. Dann, Parlamento im Exekutiv-Föderalismus (Springer 2004). With regard to the crisis management since 2009 see Habermas, supra n. 6, p. 52-53; with proposals to enhance democratic control see C. Franzius, ‘Demokratisierung der Europäischen Union’, Europarecht (2013) p. 655 at p. 660-668.
T FEU and the obligations and discipline under Articles 123 to 126 TFEU. It was the Community method that made the EU a success as an instrument for preserving peace among the Member States and for increasing welfare. Integration did what cooperation of sovereign states, over centuries, could not achieve. Why should this be different in political matters as important as economic and fiscal policies? In these important matters, a fortiori, the same principle of integration should apply precisely because they are so important.

What follows is that, to the extent necessary for backing the common currency, economic, fiscal and re-distributional policies need to be decided at the European level, with procedures that ensure the principles of subsidiarity as well as democratic accountability and participation.64 As subsidiarity only ensures that decisions are taken as closely as possible to the citizen (Article 1 (2) TEU) and therefore is in itself an imperative of democracy, but is primarily a subject of political rather than legal discourse, striving for better democratic accountability and participation particularly in the areas of economic and fiscal policies is key for stabilizing the Euro and the EU at large.

3. Engage in European Politics

Governments will not take the necessary steps if citizens do not engage and take ownership of the EU and responsibility for its future at national and at the European level. A new movement is needed, bottom-up, claiming reforms by giving national parliaments and the European Parliament control over economic and budgetary policies. They are not only a ‘matter of common concern’, as Article 121 (1) TFEU puts it, but common policies.

This call may provoke the question: does the constitutional setting for democratic decision-making in the EU provide for the necessary instruments and procedures to ensure democratic accountability and participation as required for policies as salient for the individual as economic, budget and, hence, re-distributional policies? My answer is yes. However, given the provisions of the Treaties on representative and participatory democracy (Articles 10 and 11 TEU), on the active role of the national parliaments (Article 12 TEU), on transparency and access to information (Article 15 TFEU) the ‘democratic potential’ of the EU is far from being fully used. The more EU policies are understood as relevant for the daily life of citizens, the more citizens will use the two channels of participation and control at their disposal, directly through the European Parliament and indirectly through their respective national parliaments. The internet presents previously unknown opportunities of information and active participation and so better enables people and civil society to assume their democratic rights and responsibilities.65

Most recently, public campaigns on the internet led the European Parliament to refuse its consent to ACTA and so brought the agreement to fail. This example shows that engagement even of a few activists can make a difference.66 The European Commission has made transparent the relevant text of the free 64 See for more details: I. Pernice et al., A Democratic Solution to the Crisis. Reform Steps towards a Democratically Based Economic and Financial Constitution for Europe. (Noms 2012).

65 See also Pernice, supra n. Fehler! Textmarke nicht definiert., p. 194-197.
66 The question may be raised, however, if it is ‘democratic’ if two or three Million protesters out of 500 million people in the EU produces such an effect.
trade agreement with Canada and on this basis launched a public consultation on investment protection in TTIP. It so has collected thousands of important comments and critiques to be considered in the coming rounds of negotiations with the US. In addition, campaigns and even a European Citizens Initiative against free trade agreements like CETA or TTIP have started, and it is likely that they will have an effect on how the future transatlantic relationship will be shaped.

Engaging in the discussion on the reform of the Treaties with a view to make the EU ready for a sustainable common currency based upon common economic and fiscal policies, as far as necessary, should be the next step. The EU and its future is in the hand of the citizens of the Member States acting in their capacity as the citizens of the Union.

CONCLUSION

Multilevel constitutionalism is about the role of the individual in shaping the constitutional architecture of multilevel political systems like the EU. It places the citizen in the centre, while the Member States’ constitutions remain the basis of the construction and Member States play an important role in the functioning of the system. But it cannot function democratically if the citizens remain unaware of their crucial role. Democracy is not a gift but an opportunity.

Thus, a change of people’s minds is a condition for overcoming the crisis of democracy in Europe. This crisis is basically rooted not in the EU but within the Member States. Taking ownership of the EU, taking subsidiarity seriously, and engaging not only in the discussion on the reform of the Treaties but also in real European politics would allow citizens of the Union to overcome the crisis of democracy. Therefore, a change of mind and perception will result in a change of the ‘masters of the Treaties’ and of the actual European policies, from states to active and responsible citizens.

This is the way forward.

---

68 See e.g. Attac call for a self-organised initiative after the application for a formal one was rejected by the Commission, <www.attac.de/ebi>, visited 11 July 2015. To bring the case to the ECJ under Article 263 TFEU has been decided by a consortium of initiatives ‘Stop TTIP’: see <www.ttip-unfairhandelbar.de/start/ebi/>, visited 11 July 2015.